I have already executed a will but want to make some changes in it. Is it safe to execute a new will or will a codicil suffice?

- Rajini Sachdev A codicil only amends a previously executed will. Hence, the intention of the testator has to be carried out in terms of the will read with the codicil. The codicil will not supersede the entire will. If you wish to make only a few changes in your will, it is simpler to execute a codicil instead of re-writing the entire will. Your codicil must clearly set out the changes in the manner of inheritance. If you wish to make many or significant changes with respect to your heirs and manner of inheritance, you may execute a new will instead. Once executed, the new will shall be considered as your final will and shall supersede your previous will/s.

My widowed mother executed a gift deed of one of her properties in my favour a year ago, which was not registered. Thereafter, I allowed my mother and brother to stay in the property. Now my mother has expired and I have asked my brother to vacate the property. However, he has refused to do so. How can I get back possession of my property?

- Snighdha Shah

As per applicable law, gift deed of an immoveable property is compulsorily registerable. Unregistered gift deed does not transfer and confer any title in the property in favour of transferee. Accordingly, you cannot claim title in the property on basis of the said unregistered gift deed. You may further note that since the gift deed is not registered and the time period for registration of a document as prescribed under the applicable law has already lapsed, the gift deed cannot be registered now.
